

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE.

At this stage in the study of Korean, the work of preparing a dictionary is attended by a long series of discouragements. There being no written record of colloquial the labor of finding words to begin with quenches any desire for further effort. Japanese scholars have had similar difficulties to contend with, and how great these are is proven by the fact, that notwithstanding so many years of study and preparation, an unabridged dictionary published in the autumn of last year (1896), is found to lack many of the common words of the language. This defect is certainly not due to insufficient scholarship on the part of the compilers, but to the impossibility of finding words, even simple ones, without something to suggest them.

In the work of preparing the dictionary, the list of words compiled by the French Fathers has been used as a basis. During the six years of preparation, several thousand more have been added from available sources, and yet the dictionary makes no pretensions to being unabridged, as such is an impossibility at this stage in the language.

Another discouragement is the fact that there are no natives prepared as yet for the task of lexicography. One thing all educated Koreans know is the use of a word in its proper connection, but when it comes to taking it independently, and defining it by other terms, the conditions and requirements are entirely foreign to their mode of thought. The only way to arrive at a definition is by comparing sentences that show the possible ways in which it is used by trustworthy speakers of the capital. This has been the aim in the prosecution of the work. Of course it will be seen that there is here also the same difficulty that there was in finding words, for how is the clew to be suggested by which all the uses may be thought of. When it comes to defining so many thousands of words, more or less important, the time at one's disposal has to be apportioned carefully to bring the work within reasonable limits, for an unlimited time may be spent and still leave portions incomplete and insufficiently tested.

Another discouragement is the difference between the sound of the colloquial, and the book-form system of spelling. It is quite easy to suggest that the colloquial be followed throughout, but there are innumerable obstacles in the way of such a course. The Okp'yön has fixed the readings of the characters, though these readings do not in every case agree with the sound of the colloquial. There are also book-forms of the vernacular, that are already in everyday use. These and other conditions have contributed to form a question, that we had no desire to sit in judgment on. As it is, a middle course has been chosen, so as to avoid as far as possible extreme book-forms and also a too literal rendering of the colloquial.

Another serious question has been as to the dividing line between the colloquial and Chinese literary expressions (文字). In view of this difficulty, it was found necessary to add Part II, containing all the characters of the Okp'yön with the meanings taken from Giles' Chinese Dictionary, and the Okp'yön itself, in the desire to make the work as complete as possible for literary expressions as well.

It seemed in accordance with the wishes of those most interested, that the alphabetical order of the French Dictionary be followed. The order is: ㅏ a, ㅑ ya, ㅓ a, ㅕ ö or ü, ㅗ yö or yu, ㅛ eu, ㅜ i, ㅝ o, ㅞ yo, ㅠ u, ㅠ yu, ㅎ h, ㄱ k or g, ㅋ k', ㅁ m, ㄴ n, ㅇ ng, ㅂ p or b, ㅅ p', ㄷ l or r, ㅈ s or t, ㅊ t or d, ㅌ t', ㅊ ch or j, ㅊ ch'. A slight change or two will be noticed, whereas in the French Dictionary the ㅈ and ㅊ, and ㅌ and ㅊ are in some cases regarded as one letter, and so appear side by side, in the present work they are separated entirely, and the order of the list given above is adhered to strictly, regardless of variations in the sounds of the letters.

The fact that the order of the English alphabet differs from the order of the Korean followed in the dictionary, puts accompanying romanization out of the question. The words in the dictionary have been numbered, so that the romanized lists could be arranged separately in alphabetical order, with the page and number after each, by which means it would be possible for those to use the dictionary who do not read the native script. It was the intention to publish the romanized list which is already prepared, with the preface, but the time already occupied has so far exceeded the expected limit, that it will have to be put off for the present, though the hope is that it will be ultimately printed in such form that it can be bound with the dictionary.

I take pleasure here in acknowledging assistance received from the Dictionnaire coréen-français in Part I and from Giles' Chinese Dictionary in Part II also from the labors of Dr. Underwood and Mr. Scott. The concise definitions found in Giles' Chinese Dictionary are quite as helpful to a Korean student as to a student in China. Fully appreciating their worth, I have taken the liberty in Part II, of using them whenever they were found to correspond to the Korean use of the character.

But more than from any other has the work gathered whatever merit in form it possesses from the valuable suggestions and emendations of the Rev. T.M. MacNair M.A. of Tokyo, whose proof reading and assistance throughout have been given as a voluntary offering in the midst of clerical and literary work that already more than occupied his time.

Mention is made of the names of Koreans who have been associated with me, not without the regret that one experiences in parting from intimate friends, who have won your confidence and respect, and with the remembrance of whom you associate the charms and absurdities of the Far East: 鄭東鳴, 梁時英, 李昌植, 李得秀, 李謙來, 梁宜鍾, 趙鍾甲, 申冕休.

How far my desire to provide something that will be of assistance to fellow students in the language will be realized, remains to be seen. I am aware of many defects in the work. Typographical errors alone that remain, in spite of careful proof reading, are numerous and are one of the disappointments, unavoidable it seems, where printers have to work as in this case with unknown languages. Notwithstanding defects, it is offered as an honest effort, and as the best that I could do under the circumstances and with the means at my disposal.

INTRODUCTION.

If language is rightly defined as the expression of thoughts by means of written words or articulate sounds, Korea like Japan, has virtually three languages, the colloquial, the book-form, and the character, book-form being written in the native script, and the character in Chinese.

It is still a matter of conjecture, as to whether Korean is allied to any other language of Eastern Asia. It is still in the agglutinative stage, and in this respect resembles Japanese, but the proofs thus far adduced as to its origin are exceedingly vague.

The Colloquial. The colloquial is a language without a literature, or written correspondent of any kind whatever. It has been handed down from antiquity by the sound only, which accounts for its present indefiniteness. Different parts of the country show variations in pronunciation, that increase in proportion to the distance of the place from the capital, the language of which is regarded as the standard.

The order of words in the Korean colloquial differs widely from that of the Chinese, so much so in fact, that every written communication has to be translated into the speech of the people, before it can be heard intelligibly, the character exhibiting an order that is correct for the eye but incorrect for the ear. The following sentence will illustrate this fact: We cover ourselves with grass-clothes, as a protection against the rain. The order of the Chinese is: We cover with grass-clothes ourselves, as a protection against the rain. Whereas that of the colloquial is: Rain for protection against with grass-clothes ourselves we cover. Generally speaking, the order of the colloquial is, first the subject, preceded by its qualifiers, then the adverbs or adverbial clauses, frequently interchangeable with the object, while the verb completes the sentence.

Book Language. In the order of the sentence book-language resembles the colloquial, but it has a much larger admixture of Chinese forms, and is cumbered with ojosa, or decorative words, that have no meaning, and are simply thrown in for the sake of the sound, or to emphasize the manner of expression rather than the thought expressed. The literature of this class is very limited, and what there is, is confined chiefly to renderings of the Classics, and to a few books on filial piety and relationship.

*In Korean the sounds of k, t, p and ch when occurring in the body of the word and at the beginning of a syllable are usually changed to g, d, b, and j.

In the Philological Essay prefacing Giles' Chinese Dictionary we find this statement regarding the Korean native script. "The educated Koreans seem ashamed to confess any knowledge of their own written character, which they call Unmun, or 'vulgar script'; but as the most ignorant of both sexes can read it, there can be little doubt that the most highly educated can do so too, especially seeing that any European can learn to read it in an hour, yet there are some very good works including histories in the native Korean, and it is too early to speak positively upon the literary possibilities of the vulgar character. Its great defect is that it is usually written in detached monosyllables, without anything to show where each word begins and ends; with an entire absence of punctuation, capital letters, hyphens, inverted commas or any other facilitating marks, whatever."

This statement is very misleading. Chinese is quite as much the written language of Korea as of China itself, just as English is associated with the American continent quite as much as with England. It is, in fact, the native written language and was in existence as such centuries before the origin of the "vulgar" script. A false impression is conveyed by the very first sentence of the Essay, which would seem to imply that the Korean has discarded his own for a foreign language; and as to the assertion that people of both sexes are able to read it, it is true that many are familiar with the sounds of the separate syllables, just as they are with separate characters, but as for intelligent reading it is quite as difficult to find it of the native script as of the character itself. We know of no European who has learned to read in even a few months, much less in a single hour; in fact many intelligent students have worked for years without acquiring the art of really reading Unmun. Neither do we know of valuable books apart from renderings of the classics, or other Chinese compositions, that have been published in this form. As for defects there are undoubtedly many, but the one mentioned by the essayist does not exist. Though written in detached monosyllables, the Korean Script possesses case and verbal endings, connectives, paragraph marks, the spacing of certain words etc. that take the place of punctuation, capital letters, inverted commas and other facilitating marks.

The writer is also quite astray in his account of the origin and authorship of the Unmun. Söljōng, to whom he ascribes it, was a Buddhist of ancient Silla, and Unmun was not invented till 1445 A.D. or during the present dynasty. His conclusions too, as to its being formed from Sanscrit, seem quite as vague. There is no conclusive evidence from historical records as to the origin of the Unmun. Some say it was modelled after Brahmin writing as well as after the ancient "seal" characters of China. The Kuk Cho Po Kam referred to by Mr. Scott in the Introduction to his English-Korean Dictionary mentions only the latter. It says, "His Majesty (King Sejong) formed the twenty-eight letters of the Unmun, from the ancient "seal" character (of the Chinese) and divided them into first, middle and final sounds." It goes on to describe how, in shape and sound, they conform throughout to Confucian philosophy, without a word of mention as to Buddhism.

Chinese Characters. From the most ancient times Chinese seems to have been associated with Korea. At an early date it became the written language for the state, and has continued to hold this place of importance down to the present, mulli (文理) the "classical style," being still the only official means of written communication. While preserving closely the original sounds of the character, Korean has lost the tones, though the fact remains, that a character having the "even" (平) tone in China, is usually marked by a short sound in Korea; while those having the "rising," (上), "sinking," (去), and "entering" (入) tones, are characterized by long sounds.

When Koreans read Chinese, they insert the vernacular connectives and endings here and there as the sense requires, the correct insertion of these, affording proof that the reader understands the thought. The acquiring of this art is attended with much labor and study, and so ancient scholars composed a system by which these connectives and endings were expressed by characters written alongside the text. Later on, these were abbreviated, much as is the case with the Japanese Kana, until they took on the forms that are now no use.

*In Korean the sounds of k, t, p and ch when occurring in the body of the word and at the beginning of a syllable are usually changed to g, d, b, and j.

In the Philological Essay prefacing Giles' Chinese Dictionary we find this statement regarding the Korean native script. "The educated Koreans seem ashamed to confess any knowledge of their own written character, which they call Ummun, or 'vulgar script'; but as the most ignorant of both sexes can read it, there can be little doubt that the most highly educated can do so too, especially seeing that any European can learn to read it in an hour, yet there are some very good works including histories in the native Korean, and it is too early to speak positively upon the literary possibilities of the vulgar character. Its great defect is that it is usually written in detached monosyllables, without anything to show where each word begins and ends; with an entire absence of punctuation, capital letters, hyphens, inverted commas or any other facilitating marks, whatever."

This statement is very misleading. Chinese is quite as much the written language of Korea as of China itself, just as English is associated with the American continent quite as much as with England. It is, in fact, the native written language and was in existence as such centuries before the origin of the "vulgar" script. A false impression is conveyed by the very first sentence of the Essay, which would seem to imply that the Korean has discarded his own for a foreign language; and as to the assertion that people of both sexes are able to read it, it is true that many are familiar with the sounds of the separate syllables, just as they are with separate characters, but as for intelligent reading it is quite as difficult to find it of the native script as of the character itself. We know of no European who has learned to read in even a few months, much less in a single hour; in fact many intelligent students have worked for years without acquiring the art of really reading Ummun. Neither do we know of valuable books apart from renderings of the classics, or other Chinese compositions, that have been published in this form. As for defects there are undoubtedly many, but the one mentioned by the essayist does not exist. Though written in detached monosyllables, the Korean Script possesses case and verbal endings, connectives, paragraph marks, the spacing of certain words etc. that take the place of punctuation, capital letters, inverted commas and other facilitating marks.

The writer is also quite astray in his account of the origin and authorship of the Ummun. Söljōng, to whom he ascribes it, was a Buddhist of ancient Silla, and Ummun was not invented till 1445 A.D. or during the present dynasty. His conclusions too, as to its being formed from Sanscrit, seem quite as vague. There is no conclusive evidence from historical records as to the origin of the Ummun. Some say it was modelled after Brahmin writing as well as after the ancient "seal" characters of China. The Kuk Cho Po Kam referred to by Mr. Scott in the Introduction to his English-Korean Dictionary mentions only the latter. It says, "His Majesty (King Sejong) formed the twenty-eight letters of the Ummun, from the ancient "seal" character (of the Chinese) and divided them into first, middle and final sounds." It goes on to describe how, in shape and sound, they conform throughout to Confucian philosophy, without a word of mention as to Buddhism.

Chinese Characters. From the most ancient times Chinese seems to have been associated with Korea. At an early date it became the written language for the state, and has continued to hold this place of importance down to the present, mulli (文理) the "classical style," being still the only official means of written communication. While preserving closely the original sounds of the character, Korean has lost the tones, though the fact remains, that a character having the "even" (平) tone in China, is usually marked by a short sound in Korea; while those having the "rising," (上), "sinking," (去), and "entering" (入) tones, are characterized by long sounds.

When Koreans read Chinese, they insert the vernacular connectives and endings here and there as the sense requires, the correct insertion of these, affording proof that the reader understands the thought. The acquiring of this art is attended with much labor and study, and so ancient scholars composed a system by which these connectives and endings were expressed by characters written alongside the text. Later on, these were abbreviated, much as is the case with the Japanese Kana, until they took on the forms that are now in use.

EXPLANATIONS OF MARKS, CONTRACTIONS ETC.

- (1) The asterisk* indicates the reading of a Chinese character. In the case of No. 2 page 1 the asterisk is a typographical error and should not be there, but in No. 4 아 양 5. 額掩 (나 마.*익) (7 리 울.*업). The 익 is the reading or name of the first Chinese character, while 업 is the reading of the second, and so each has an asterisk. There being some twenty 익 characters in the Okp'yön, the word 나 마 or 'brow' distinguishes this one from the others; so 7 리 울 distinguishes this 업 from other 업 characters; also in No. 5 아 and 양 are the Chinese readings one asterisk serving for both while 아 당 홀 and 모 양 are the distinguishing words.
- (2) The mark ˊ following a word shows that the first syllable is long in sound, while ˋ shows that it is short.
- (3) Sec refers to a synonym or word related in use. Also refers to a different form of spelling the same word. Opp. refers to a word used as an opposite or in contrast.

 (Hon.) „ „ „ „ „ „ used as an honorific.

 (Ad.) „ „ „ „ „ „ to be found in the addenda.
- (5) For example on page 3 No. 10 the word 아 귀 is followed by (차 다) (세 다) and (무 린 다) in brackets, showing that these are the ordinary verbs used with the noun 아 귀, the meanings are seen in Nos. 14, 15 and 17.; so after the word 갖 we find (쓰 다), after the word 싼, (싼 다), (훔 다), and so on.
- (6) (B.O.) refers to the 詩傳 or Book of Odes.
 (B.H.) „ „ „ 書傳 „ Book of History.
 (A.) „ „ „ 論語 „ Analects.

 (C.C.) „ „ „ 周易 „ Canon of Changes.
 (D.M.) „ „ „ 中庸 „ Doctrine of the Mean.
- (7) In Part II the numbers of the characters do not always come in succession; when the same number occurs twice, the second is marked a in the Index. For example 𪛗 has two characters numbered 16. In the Index however the second 16 is marked 16*a* so that there need be no confusion in finding the characters by the Radical.
- (8) (R.) indicates that the character is reduplicated.
